Introduction

A Quality Management System according to the certifiable requirements standard ISO 9001 is of vital importance to many companies, large and small. ISO 9001:2000 has been revised and published in Nov. 2008 and will cease to be valid by November 2010. In India, it has been adopted as an Indian Standard and will also be available in English.

Even though ISO states that the 2008 revision changes none of the requirements of 2000 edition, there are in fact over 70 changes to requirements and 'Notes'. Additionally, close study reveals that some 25 of them have the potential to require extra effort in an existing Quality Management System according to the 2000 edition. On the other hand, there are 16 text changes which could possibly permit a reduction of work, especially in the area of documentation.

The scope of the measures to be taken to accommodate these changes will depend greatly on the maturity and depth of the existing Quality Management System and individual interpretations of the requirements in the 2000 edition, with every organization having to act differently.
